THE LOYOLA MAN

The Complete Man is an able man, clear in thought, rich in vision, vigorous in act; he is a man learned in the arts and sciences, a student of history with a sharp, sound view of his own times, a right interpretation of the past, a true concept of the future; he is a man who lives fully and vividly, gladly accepting the challenge of life, exulting in its adventure; finally—and most important—he is a good man; warm of heart, gentle, seeking the right, charitable in thought as well as deed—in a word, a Christian gentleman.

Loyola develops the Complete Man by training his faculties—his mind, his imagination, his will; by instructing him in right knowledge, by making him at home in the arts and sciences; by preparing him for service to his country and his fellow-man, teaching him his rights and duties as a member of society; and by inspiring him to right living, making him aware of the obligations of his immortality, and setting before him the teaching, the example, and the divine beneficence of Christ.

Loyola approaches this difficult task of developing the Complete Man with four centuries of the experience of Jesuit education behind it. Loyola is modern but not experimental; scientific but not mechanistic; cultural but not visionary; youthful but not erratic; realistic but not pagan.

Loyola aims to train a man for success and for possible greatness; but whatever a man's worldly achievement, Loyola's training insists that his design of living include the fulfillment of his obligations toward God and his own soul, prepares him thus to be, in the best sense, a Complete Man, a Citizen of Two Worlds.
